HOW TO PRUNE YOUR NELSON TREES FOR PLANTING

During the digging process on bareroot trees or transplanting from container grown liner (CGL), trees lose a portion of the root system they formerly had. To ensure rapid vigorous growth in their new location, the tops should be pruned back, and broken or bruised roots should be trimmed so there is a favorable balance of root over top. Leave as much of the root system as possible and always use clean sharp tools and make fresh clean cuts when pruning.

Damaged branches should be trimmed off below the point of injury. The central leader should be left intact to build a high crown and side branches should be shortened. If trees are to be planted into landscapes or containers, trim the branches back by at least a third (see FOR LANDSCAPING illustration). If planting for nursery stock rows, trim the branches back by at least half their length (see FOR NURSERY illustration). Scaffold branching may also be thinned for nursery trees to improve structure long term. One-third to one-half of the total branching may be removed, especially trees with dense canopies like weeping cherry. This harsh treatment results in rapid growth. Broken roots should be trimmed back above the break or bruised ends, leaving as much of the root system as possible, so they will regenerate fastest. This thinning of the crown and roots improves survival rate and regrowth while still preserving the apparent size of the tree.

CARE & HANDLING

We take every precaution through the growing, harvesting, storage and shipping process so your stock arrives to you in the best possible condition. The trees are loaded into a temperature-controlled truck with the refrigeration set to 40 – 45°F, along with a Sensitech recorder to document the actual temperature inside the van.

STORING

The trees must be protected from freezing conditions, ideally in a frost protected structure. Dehydration is a concern which can be mitigated by mulching the root stems with wet straw or other suitable mulch and keep damp, but not too wet. Material in containers should not be allowed to dry out.

Outside storage can work, where the roots are healed in sawdust or mulch. This is not recommended if temperatures are expected to be below freezing for an extended period due to damage to trunks and branches.

PLANTING

Prior to planting, prune the root system following the pruning instructions on the previous page. If you remove 30% of the roots you need to reduce the length of the branches by 40-50%.

Soil should be moist, but not too wet, allowing the soil to blend around the root system. Irrigate in dry conditions as light rain fall may not offer adequate soil moisture.

Field fertilization is best done prior to planting. Soil tests can help to determine which amendments are needed. Once the trees are growing, additional fertilization may be necessary.
